HALLOWEEN PARADE

It is an annual tradition for children from the Infant/Toddler and Preschool floors to parade outside and over to the Senior Center. Families often stand outside to watch the children parade by. The seniors love to see the children's costumes and they hand out treats to every child. This year the Halloween Parade will be on Tuesday, October 31st at 10:00am!

Sharing Ones Wealth

Now that I have entered the elite group called Senior Citizens I need to follow Booth Tarkington's advice "Cherish all your happy moments; they make a fine cushion for old age." One of the happy times as a young child was going out on Halloween and collecting as many treats as I could. As we got older, we were allowed to extend our Trick or Treating beyond just our street. As one of the oldest siblings this meant that I could get more than the younger members of the family. With a pillowcase in hand my friends and I left the house as soon as time allowed and filled one pillowcase after another returning home to empty our treasures and go out again. Our only thoughts were how lucky we were to have all these treats and how great it was to have treats in the house that we usually didn't have.

My mother however took this opportunity to teach us the lesson of sharing your wealth with others. As each child looked through their pile of treats thinking "What should I eat first?" mom would bring out large cans and dump everyone's candy into them. I can remember protesting because I walked the furthest and collected the most and now it was all mixed up. How was I to know what candy was mine? Mom would calmly explain that getting more only meant sharing more. Believe me, I protested but mom held firm. Not only that, she added to my frustration by hiding the cans and allowed each child to make a selection from our treasure only when she permitted.

I never remember being preached to about sharing my gifts, time and treasures I only remember seeing it through the examples given to me by the adults in my life - adults who taught values through their actions. As a person we make the choice of what values we want in our life and those we choose not to follow. The values we choose make up the person we are.

As today's adults we have a tremendous responsibility because we are teaching values to the younger generation through our actions. Hopefully, they are seeing kindness, generosity, and respect for others.
